"This beautifully produced and handsome volume will be warmly welcomed by all students of Greek Archaeology, and especially by those who devote themselves to the study of the early civilisations of the island settlements and coast towns in the Mediterranean. . . . This is the first work in which an attempt has been made to deal with the subject from a comprehensive and connected point of view, and curators of Museums and collections will find the book very useful in dealing with and dating scarabs and other Egyptian objects from the Mediterranean sites. . . . Tables 1-5 at the end of the book crystallize the main results of Mr Pendlebury's work and the student will find them time-saving and satisfactory."

[Immediately.]

Volume III of Sir Arthur Evans' great work, now in an advanced stage of preparation, is occupied with the Northern and Eastern sections of the building, and covers the great transitional Age M.M. III-L.M. I. Among the many artistic records included are the Miniature Frescoes showing ladies of modern style on the Grand Stands, and the Dance and Sacred Grove. Another fresco series represents various exciting scenes of the bull ring. The painted reliefs from the Northern entrance, amongst which is the noble head of a charging bull, are shown to form part of a great composition, and the high reliefs from the East Hall illustrate the culmination of Minoan Art. The Shield Fresco on the grand staircase leads to the reconstitution of the actual shields in the great hall below as in the "Megaron" of Odysseus. This and the adjoining "Queen's Megaron" enable us to recover the most intimate details of the domestic life of the Palace. From the "ivory deposit" there is here reclaimed a marvellous figure of a Boy-God shown to have been grouped with the Goddess now in Boston—the group affording the most interesting existing record of the Mother and Child in Minoan religion.
